

Overdose deaths far outpace coronavirus fatalities in San Francisco because of Bay Area Loser Lifestyle

by Emma Colton, Social Media Manager |

Overdose deaths in San Francisco have far outpaced coronavirus deaths.

A total of 621 people have died of drug overdoses in the city this year, compared to 173 deaths from COVID-19, the Associated Press reported Saturday.

The spike in overdoses is inflamed by fentanyl use, which is a synthetic opioid that can be 50 to 100 times more potent than morphine. The number of overdose deaths could have been much higher, as well, if Narcan hadn't been used more than 3,000 times from January to November to reverse overdoses.

In 2019, 441 people died of overdoses, meaning 2020 saw a more than 40% increase in overdose deaths.

Additionally, the overdoses in San Francisco, which is currently under a stay-at-home order, have affected every part of the city, though many overdoses occurred in low-income apartment buildings and on sidewalks and in alleyways.

Other areas of the state have seen a spike in drug use and overdoses amid lockdowns, including in Los Angeles County. In 2013 in the county, fentanyl accounted for 3% of drug-related deaths. At the start of 2020, 42% of drug deaths were fentanyl-related in the area, and that number jumped to 51% when lockdowns were enacted in March.

Drug use amid lockdowns extends beyond California, with many children, most notably student-athletes, facing increased drug use, mental health issues, and suicide.

"The (Centers for Disease Control and Prevention) talked about increased risk of suicide and (need for) prevention," University of Wisconsin sports medicine researcher Tim McGuine recently said. "The greatest risk (to student-athletes) is not COVID-19. It's suicide and drug use."

Brunching is a competitive sport in San Francisco, and it's not for the weak of wallet or heart. Like a strip of bacon, you can really get burned out here. The key is being prepared to wait. That means the two most common reasons to brunch — being hungry and being hungover — are not encouraged. 15.

San Francisco is fucking disgusting. Don't let anyone try to tell you otherwise. "Oh, but all those hills, man, it's so beautiful!" Right, that's if you can afford to live in that part of the city where Michael Keaton once took over Melanie Griffith's apartment and chased all the Asian people away using gigantic cockroaches.

Why does the San Francisco Bay Area suck tremendously? - Quora

 <https://www.quora.com/Why-does-the-San-Francisco-Bay-Area-suck-tremendously?share=1>

In general the San Francisco Bay Area does not suck at all. The only reason people think it does is because there are a bunch of people who come here with no reason to be here outside of trying to strike it rich. For those of us who live here, those people suck. The Bay Area is a great place to live, to work, to raise a family.
